

Hello, my name is Justin Ng and I am applying for the role of Frontend Developer at Education First. As someone who has had the opportunity to work abroad as part of my degree, I understand the value in fully immersing yourself into another culture. This would be a great chance for me to combine my frontend skills and my appreciation for actively seeking new cultural experiences.

I am a recent graduate of Juno's web development bootcamp, where I built up a strong foundation and understanding of HTML, CSS and JavaScript. There I was able to complete a portfolio, that contains both independent work as well as collaborative projects. I am always working on personal projects to continue practicing my coding skills and as well as broadening my knowledge as I have a passion for learning new things.

Before I decided to make a transition into web development, I was a field associate for Google maps, where I collected data with the aims of improving the accuracy of the Geo-locations for different types of businesses. My main takeaways from that role were collaborating within a team to achieve certain targets, effective time management and communicating with professionals from various industries.

I saw my time at this role as the first steppingstone into the tech industry and I am eager to continue learning and developing my frontend skills and hopefully make a positive contribution to your team. I'd love to connect with you or just grab 5-10 minutes of your time. I have linked my Calendly so please feel free to book a time that suits us both best.
